WEEKLY DIGEST
July 22, 2020

Coronavirus cases continue to skyrocket in the U.S., increasing by almost a half million since last week's Digest. The daily death toll exceeded 1,000 on Tuesday, the highest level in weeks. The business sector is becoming increasingly more pessimistic about the economic recovery given that the virus is continuing to run rampant.

While we continue to grapple with the coronavirus crisis, protests against racial injustice are continuing across the U.S. Brands have taken action to show their support for the movement; however a recent Morning Consult poll found that Black Americans are skeptical as to whether brands claiming to support the Black Lives Matter movement are sincere. 62% of Black Americans believe brands are supporting the movement because those brands don't want to lose customers, and only 19% believe brands truly care about the movement. Similar results were seen among White Americans. That same survey found that Black Americans would rather see those brands address racism within their own corporations (see Chart of the Day), rather than posting about it on social media. CBS is one company that has taken this to heart (see Spotlight On: CBS to bring more diverse perspectives to entertainment). Brands will only be seen as making a meaningful difference if they back up their words with concrete and impactful action.

Black consumers paint a complicated picture on what brands can do to fight racial inequality

Respondents were asked "Since the death of George Floyd in police custody, many companies have announced efforts towards addressing racial inequality in the United States. In your opinion, what's the one thing that companies can do to fight racial inequality?" Responses are colored by topic and clustered with similar responses.

RT @EdMarkey Whole Foods is disciplining workers for showing their support for Black Lives Matter. That is shameful. We must stand in solidarity with these workers and people everywhere demanding racial justice. Everyone should be able to say loudly and clearly that Black lives matter.

Spotlight On: CBS to bring more diverse perspectives to entertainment

CBS has been making several internal changes to increase diverse representation both in front of and behind the camera, especially with creators and leadership roles on the shows.

Last week it announced it will devote 25% of its script development budget to projects created or co-created by Black, Indigenous, and People of Color (BIPOC) starting in the 2021-2022 development season. It has also set a target to have a minimum of 40% BIPOC representation in their writers' rooms beginning in 2021-2022. This will increase to 50% the season afterwards. Furthermore, it has committed to hiring additional BIPOC writers on some of their series for the 2020-2021 season.

And most recently, CBS and NAACP struck a multi-year partnership agreement to create content featuring Black stories for broadcast, cable, and streaming. This partnership will establish a dedicated development team for NAACP-produced content.
